Today is our fourth Thanksgiving with Liz in prison

Despite everything I have so much to be thankful for. Our two beautiful kids, a love thats only grown stronger through all of this. The incredible kindness of people who have stood beside us

I'm thankful for all the life we still have ahead of us. The memories yet to be made, the good we can still do in this world. I really believe our most beautiful days are still ahead of us

But time is precious and there will never be enough time together

Ivy was three months old when her mother went away
Wills wasn't even two
They're three and five now

I've spent the last 3 and a half years trying to make visiting their mother in prison feel normal. Building our own little worlds in that prison yard. Reading them her letters at bedtime. Trying to keep her a part of every little moment of their childhood

There is little normal about this

Liz is serving an 11 year sentence for a nonviolent crime. She was acquitted of every charge related to patients. Investors themselves acknowledged that their losses caused them no financial hardship

Whatever you think of Liz, what purpose does keeping her there serve? Who benefits from taking another year of their childhood away from them? How much good could she do with her freedom?

Theres so much beauty in our lives that I wish I could share with her. Every time something wonderful happens with the kids she's still the first person I want to tell

I would give anything to have her sitting beside us at the table today

These are years we will never get back

It's time for Liz to come home

Wills needs his mom
Ivy needs her mom

And I need my best friend
