Dear Terry,

The intent of this letter is to start a dialogue in service of taking responsibility for the emotional challenge that this experience has caused you and your family. I have done so much thinking and learning and have looked inside myself with the help of my wife, my family, and professionals to understand the person that I am, and why I am that person. I, like you, have many things in my life that I am only now really processing and understanding as an adult. I have dedicated myself to spiritual self-discovery in an effort to be the best person that I can be for the rest of my life, and hopefully make a difference to me, my family, and everyone else that I know.

I just wanted you to know where I am coming from in writing this letter. I am concerned that this can be misinterpreted if it is not accepted with an open heart, and I am willing to take that risk to be authentic as a human being. My intent is to have us both heal from this situation and move forward.

To that end, I know that you didn't ask for any of this. Again, I take responsibility for us being here now, together in this situation. I am sorry for all of it. I am writing this note with the hope of us talking in person to come together and become a positive story in a very messed up world. Using this platform to show people love, honesty, responsibility, compassion, and forgiveness are all possible. I want to use this moment to be a positive influence with you and not just another Hollywood story that becomes the forever narrative of who we both are. We both are so much more and have so much more to offer. I believe positive light was always your motive and intention when you came out with your tweet. To help facilitate change and make a better world and a better business. I am coming to terms with myself as to why I behaved the way I have: fear, stress, and insecurity. These are all things that I am working on.

I am sure that this whole situation is an unwanted experience for you. I have no right to expect your forgiveness, but I am asking for it nonetheless. I even hope that someday we can come together and go forward with compassion and understanding and be an amazing force for positivity and change in our culture. It requires me taking responsibility and understanding my behavior, and for us to start the forgiveness/healing process together.

God definitely works in unique ways and has given me these experiences as a gift of enlightenment and a force for change in my life. I see it as the gift that it is, and an opportunity to change my life path. A great gift of consciousness. It's not a gift I would necessarily wish on others, but a gift nonetheless.

With Respect and Gratitude,
Adam Venit
