supporting your children only reinforces everything I've said. It's a choice, and it comes at their expense, once again.

At least you're consistent in proving a leopard doesn't change its spots and an addict doesn't know how to learn from their mistakes.

My Goodwill towards you has officially run out. Please, don't come to me again asking for sympathy, support, or protection.

The kids are aware of your relationship. I need you to be far more thoughtful in how you engage with them. When you and I communicate calmly, you're capable of making sound decisions. That same care is often missing when it comes to the children, and the difference is not subtle. Asking Jagger if he wants to go to London may have felt casual to you, but in our situation it's not. They're vulnerable, and moments like that vulnerable, and moments like that create confusion and emotional instability. I'm asking you to pause and think before you speak or act with them. This is not about me, it's about protecting them. I've carried them through a lot in your absence. What they need now is consistency, stability, and a father who is thinking ahead about how his actions affect them. Please do better in this area. It matters.

I've been clear about the importance of sharing your travel plans, and you said you understood. It's confusing that I have to raise this again. Please confirm your departure and return dates.

PK,

This pattern of conflict and made up narratives needs to stop. It has been going on for two years and it is harming the kids.

They need stability, consistency, and clarity. What is happening right now does not give them that.

I have been consistent in how I show up for them and in trying to create a calm, functional way for us to co parent.

Two months ago, you acknowledged the damage your behavior has caused and chose a different approach. You saw the difference it made. You were clear you wanted to move forward and not repeat the past.

You know exactly what this behavior does. Going back to it is a choice, and it is one that harms our children.

I am not engaging in conflict. I am focused on them.

Your relationship is not the issue. The issue is that you chose to make it public and blindsided me instead of handling it with honesty and consideration. You knew there was a better way to do it and chose not to.

That is what creates problems. Not the situation itself, but how you handle it.

Being direct and you handle it.

Being direct and transparent would have been in line with the commitment we made and the way we had been communicating. Instead, you broke that. It did not build trust, it set us back.

We share Jagger and Phoenix. That means we do not get to disconnect or avoid this. The only way forward is stability, consistency, and respect for them.

You need to show up as respect for them.

You need to show up as a father in a real and consistent way. Not occasionally, not when it suits you, but consistently. I should not have to ask you to do that.

You do not need conflict with me in order to have a partner. I am not a threat to your personal life when you are showing up properly for your children.

This back and forth is not healthy and it does
